THE MOST TRANSLATED VERNE NOVEL

Or (A Tour of) Around the World in Eighty Days

William Butcher and Arthur B Evans

The following list attempts to provide some basic information about the bewildering variety of English translations of Le Tour du monde en quatre-vingts jours (1872). Although more than a hundred distinct editions have been published, all seem to derive from the eleven original translations listed below. It should be emphasised that much more work is needed on the general question of translations of Verne's work, which range from the outstanding to those illegally passing themselves off as authentic.

In line with the overriding aim of identifying genuinely original translations, the list below omits abridgements, simplified readers, etc. Each entry contains the name of the translator, the original publisher, place and date, and the title, if different from Around the World in Eighty Days. Next is cited the translation of the first paragraph:

En l'année 1872, la maison portant le numéro 7 de Saville-Rou, Burlington Gardens — maison dans laquelle Sheridan mourut en 1814 —, était habitée par Phileas Fogg, esq., l'un des membres les plus singuliers et les plus remarqués du Reform-Club de Londres, bien qu'il semblât prendre à tâche de ne rien faire qui pût attirer l'attention.

In addition, the opening paragraph of chapter 2 is given since this varies considerably ("Sur ma foi, se dit Passepartout, un peu ahuri tout d'abord, j'ai connu chez Mme Tussaud des bonshommes aussi vivants que mon nouveau maître"). Finally, a subjective assessment of the quality out of 10 of each translation is provided, and general comments are made on the completeness and accuracy of the text.

Reprints are generally omitted, although a few have been indicated to show the general pattern. As reported by David Cook, twenty-three of his collection of fifty-six editions of this novel are by Towle/d'Anvers (translation no. 1); and eleven by White (or Roth? — translation no. 2). The opening paragraphs of chapters 1 and 2 in the reprints cited are identical to the source translation unless indicated otherwise.

A few general conclusions emerge from the comparison. Most of the versions of this novel have been middling in quality. While generally of approximately the same length as the French text (67,000 words) and pleasant to read, nearly all change the contents or the structure of Verne's text. A few translators (eg Edward Roth, Irene R Gibbons and, to a certain extent, Jacqueline Rogers) seem to have untruthfully claimed work copied from previous texts to be their own.

It is the poorest translations that have been reprinted most often, with Towle/d'Anvers's, one of the worst, providing nearly fifty per cent of the editions. The majority of publishers of this novel, including modern ones, in fact violate the moral right of the translators to be identified, and a few subject them to derogatory treatment. Few even identify the text as a translation, and fewer still, from what language. Many of the most reputable publishers are thus continuing to behave in an unacceptable fashion.

1. Trans. Geo M Towle; JR Osgood [only Towle is indicated as translator], Boston [1873] and Geo M Towle and N d'Anvers; Sampson Low, Marston & Co, London, 1873, The Tour of the World in Eighty Days, then changed to Around the World in Eighty Days; some early Osgood editions even carry the former title on the cover and the latter on the title page.

Mr. Phileas Fogg lived, in 1872, at No. 7, Saville Row, Burlington Gardens, the house in which Sheridan died in 1814. He was one of the most noticeable members of the Reform Club, though he seemed always to avoid attracting attention; an enigmatical personage, about whom little was known, except that he was a polished man of the world.

Acknowledgements are recorded to David Cook who provided useful information from his valuable collection of editions.

A forthcoming article by Arthur B. Evans, "The English Translations of Jules Verne's Voyages Extraordinaires", will be the first to identify the different translations of all of the novels of the Extraordinary Journeys. The only other relevant article is Stephen Michaluk, Jr. "Jules Verne: A Bibliographic and Collecting Guide"; pp. 103-92. in Brian Taves and Stephen Michaluk, Jr. The Jules Verne Encyclopaedia (1996). However, this article merely lists the many successive publishers, without citing the text itself or determining whether the translations are reprints of earlier ones.
“Faith,” muttered Passepartout, somewhat flurried, “I’ve seen people at Madame Tussaud’s as lively as my new master!”

5 out of 10; sentences are omitted (including the elephant’s “musth”), phrases added and a number of mistakes made. Thus we learn that Fogg wears “vests”, is bearded, is served by waiters with “swan-skin soles”, reads the “Pall Mall” and “Morning Post and Daily News”, and eats “a chop” for breakfast. But the translation above all contains clumsy phrases: “wishing to taste the sweets of domestic life”, “viâ”, “[a] grin overspread [his] face”, “the words which Mr Fogg dropped”, “bending his eyes on Aouda”, or “[Fogg,] like a racehorse, was drawing near his last turning-point”. But in the end Fogg gets a fine reward for undergoing all this gobbledygook — the passionate response to the proposal scene is: “‘Ah!’ cried Aouda, pressing his hand to her heart’”!

Reprinted:

b) Trans. GM Towle and N Danvers [sic]; Folio Society, London, 1982
c) Bantam, New York, 1984
e) Signet, New York, 1991
f) Trans. Anon.; Library of the Future (on CD), 1991 (“... in 1816...”)
g) Penguin Popular Classics, London, 1994 “Revised and updated by Jacqueline Rogers” [directly from Geo M Towle and N d’Anvers’s text, but not acknowledging it!]. In fact, even the claim of “Revising and Updating” is false, since the translation is changed only in the Americanisation of the spelling and certain expressions.

Mr. Phileas Fogg lived, in 1872, at No. 7, Saville Row, Burlington Gardens, the house in which Sheridan died in 1814. He was one of the most prominent members of the London Reform Club, though he never did anything to attract attention; an enigmatic character about whom little was known except that he was a polished man of the world.

“To be sure,” muttered Passepartout, somewhat flurried, “I’ve seen people at Madame Tussaud’s as lively as my new master!”

h) Trans. Anon.; Viking (Penguin), New York, 1994 – annotated
i) Trans. Towle; Dover, London
j) Many online sites, eg http://JV.Gilead.org.il/works.html#l (“... in 1816...”).

2. Trans. Stephen W White (according to Taves, op. cit.); Warburton, 1874, The Tour of the World in Eighty Days (or Trans. Edward Roth, as indicated in the 1983 Scholastic edition: “... No. 1 Saville Row...”)

In the year 1872, the house No. 7, Saville Row, Burlington Gardens—the house in which Sheridan died, in 1814—was inhabited by Phileas Fogg, Esq., one of the most singular and most noticed members of the Reform Club of London, although he seemed to take care to do nothing which might attract attention.

“Upon my word,” said Passepartout to himself, “I have known at Madame Tussaud’s good people as lively as my new master!”

6 out of 10; a few paragraphs and sentences omitted, eg the paragraph about Byron in ch. 1

Reprinted:

a) Vincent Parke, New York, 1911
b) Trans. Anon.; RE King, London [1914]
c) Trans. Anon.; Collins, London [1920?]
d) Airmont, New York, 1963

e) Trans. Irene R Gibbons; Blackie, London, 1965, Round the World in Eighty Days This version appears to be a (slightly) modified version of the White translation: “In 1872, No. 7 Savile Row, Burlington Gardens — the house where Sheridan died in 1816 — was occupied by Phileas Fogg, Esq., one of the oddest and most conspicuous members of the Reform Club in London, although he appeared to make a point of never doing anything that could possibly attract attention.

“Upon my word,” Passepartout said to himself in slight bewilderment, “I have seen some fellows every bit as alive as my new master at Madame Tussaud’s!”

f) Trans. Edward Roth; Scholastic, 1983 London
g) Trans. Anon.; Derrydale, New Jersey, 1994, Round the World in Eighty Days (“... No. 7 Saville Row...”).

In the year 1872, No. 7 in Saville Row, Burlington Gardens, the house in which Sheridan died in 1814, was inhabited by Phileas Fog, Esq., one of the most eccentric, and noticeable members of the Reform Club, although he seemed to be especially careful to do nothing which could attract any one's attention.

"Assuredly," said Passepartout to himself, though rather startled at first, "I have seen people at Madame Tussaud's quite as lively as my new master."

8 out of 10; complete and fluent translation.

4. Trans. Anon; Ward, Lock & Co: Youth's Library of Wonder and Adventure [1879]

In the year 1872 the house, No. 7, Savile Row, Burlington Gardens, in which Sheridan died in 1816, was occupied by Phileas Fogg, Esquire, one of the most remarkable members of the Reform Club, though he always appeared very anxious to avoid remark.

"Egad," said Passepartout, who was rather flurried for the minute, "I have seen figures at Madame Tussaud's quite as cheerful as my new master."

6 out of 10; reasonably complete, although old-fashioned style. The translator may be Frederick Amadeus Malleson, since he did other Verne volumes for the same publisher.

Mr. Phileas Fogg lived, in 1872, at No. 7, Saville Row, Burlington Gardens. He was one of the most noticeable members of the Reform Club, though he seemed always to avoid attracting attention.

4 out of 10; since Lewis Mercier is notorious for the liberties taken in his version of Twenty Thousand Leagues under the Sea (1872), this must be a reprint of a nineteenth-century text. Reprinted Doubleday, New York, 1964, with however the beginning of chapter 2 identical to Towle/ d'Anvers'.

In the year of Grace one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two, the house in which Sheridan died in 1816—viz. No 7, Savile Row, Burlington Gardens—was occupied by Phileas Fogg, Esq., one of the most eccentric members of the Reform Club, though it always appeared as if he were very anxious to avoid remark.

"Faith," muttered Passe-partout, who for a moment felt rather in a flutter; "faith, I have seen creatures at Madame Tussaud's quite as lively as my new master."

8 out of 10; although the style is dated, this is a reasonably faithful translation.

In the year 1872, No. 7 Saville Row, Burlington Gardens, the house in which Sheridan died in 1816, was occupied by Phileas Fogg, Esq. Of the members of the Reform Club in London few, if any, were more peculiar or more specially noticed than Phileas Fogg, although he seemed to make a point of doing nothing that could draw attention.

"My word," said Passepartout to himself, a little dazed at first, "I have known at Madame Tussaud's folks with just as much life in them as my new master?"

8 out of 10; generally a good translation

Reprinted:

c) Trans. P Desages; Dent: Everyman, 1994, with some very minor changes (“revised from an earlier version by P. Desages” [xxxiii] according to the editor, Peter Costello):

In the year 1872, No. 7 Saville Row, Burlington Gardens (the house in which Sheridan died in 1814) was occupied by Phileas Fogg, Esq., one of the most unusual and more remarkable members of the Reform Club of London, although he tried his best to do nothing that would draw attention to himself.

"Pon my soul," said Passepartout to himself, a little bewildered at first. "I have known folks at Madame Tussaud's as lively as my new master!"

8. Trans. KE Lichteneker; Hamlyn, 1965

In 1872, the house at Number Seven, Saville Row was occupied by Phileas Fogg, Esquire, one of the most remarkable and unusual members of the London Reform Club. It was his habit to avoid everything which could arouse attention.

Passepartout was alone. He dropped into a chair in blank amazement. The wax models in Madame Tussaud's were, he thought, at least as spirited and high-strung as his new employer. (appearing mid-way through Chap. 1)

3 out of 10; the omission of the reference to Sheridan is indicative of the liberties and shortcuts in this version, which has only twenty chapters, instead of Verne's thirty-seven.

9. Trans. IO Evans; Associated Booksellers, Arco, 1966

In 1872 No. 7, Savile Row, Burlington Gardens, the former home of Sheridan, was occupied by Mr Phileas Fogg. He belonged to the Reform Club of London, and although he never did anything to attract attention, he was one of its most unusual and conspicuous members.

“My word!” reflected Passepartout, feeling somewhat overwhelmed, "I've seen people in Madame Tussaud's who are quite as much alive as my new master!"

3 out of 10; generally condensed rather than translated, with many of the historical and geographical passages deleted and descriptions truncated.

In 1872 No 7 Savile Row, Burlington Gardens — the house in which Sheridan died in 1816 — was occupied by Phileas Fogg Esq. He belonged to the Reform Club of London, and although he seemed to take care never to do anything which might attract attention, he was one of its strangest and most conspicuous members.

"Upon my word," Passepartout said to himself, feeling slightly taken aback, "I've seen people in Madame Tussaud's who have just as much life in them as my new master!"

7 out of 10; the Baldicks' Verne translations are generally fluent and lively

In the year 1872, No. 7 Savile Row, Burlington Gardens — the house where Sheridan died in 1814 — was occupied by Phileas Fogg, Esq. This gentleman was one of the most remarkable, and indeed most remarked upon, members of the Reform Club, although he seemed to go out of his way to do nothing that might attract any attention.

"I do believe," he said, a little dazed at first, "that I have bumped into blokes at Madame Tussaud's with as much life in them as my new bos!"

Translation attempts to be scrupulously faithful to Verne's text, aided by an in-depth knowledge of the manuscripts and the correspondence: “by far the best available” (Arthur B Evans, Science Fiction Studies 22, 1995, pp. 288-9)