Carrboro Music Festival bigger and greener

BY LYNDAL WILSON Courtesy of the Carrboro Commons

The annual Carrboro Music Festival is back this month for its 11th year.

This free event will be held on Sunday, Sept. 28, and feature over 160 artists, performing in a variety of venues throughout the town. The festival will showcase everything from rock, country and classical to electronic styles of music.

Carrboro Music Festival Coordinator Gerry Williams said there are about 10 to 15 new performers this year, with one particularly unique electronic duo playing at The Open Eye Café.

Alex Kotch and Ben Crawford will be performing experimental electronic dance music, incorporating rings from peoples' cell phones into their music, Williams said.

"The audience can call them or contact them on their computer and they can incorporate it into their music," he said. "It's really interactive...and pretty unusual."

There are also a few new venues this year that have allowed the festival to increase the number of performers. The Station and Southern Rail, on East Main Street, are new venues and will have a large stage in the parking lot, with music inside The Station. Southern Rail's back beer garden will be open as well.

Williams said the biggest challenge is scheduling the 160 to 170 performers. There is the potential to be even bigger, he said. Williams said businesses contact him with interest in the festival, but adding too many new venues would take away from the community vibe.

"(Getting too big) would take away from what the festival is all about, which is bringing everyone together," Williams said.

Kim Andrews, recreation supervisor from the Carrboro Recreation & Parks Department, said trash could also be a problem in a bigger festival. She said it is currently a clean event and they want to keep it that way. "We're in a lucky community where people are pretty educated about what to recycle and are very conscious of it," she said.

Being green is a big focus this year, which is something the organizers have really tried to achieve, Andrews said. "We're getting the food vendors involved... requiring them to use paper products, no plastic forks and Styrofoam cups."

Festival volunteers will help people with recycling and composting, because doing it commercially is different from doing it at home, she said. Other volunteers will do trash duty and recycling duty. "We are trying to be as trash free as possible," Andrews said.

A biodiesel bus from Greenway Transit Authority out of Durham will take people to and from the park-and-ride lot behind Carrboro Plaza. The bus will run from 12 to 8 p.m., so folks can park at Carrboro Plaza. There will also be pedi cabs running from 1 to 6 p.m.

However folks make it downtown, they will find a variety of music with stages all along Weaver and Main streets. Williams said that he would like more musical variety, but is happy with the current arrangements.

Karen Lewis, a Carrboro resident who attends the festival every year, said she enjoys hearing lots of different bands and styles of music. "I'm really looking forward to hearing the variety of music," she said.

"It touches all age groups," Williams said of the festival. He has met musicians who have played and told him how fun it was to have a 15-year-old granddaughter and her 70-year-old grandma come up afterwards to buy a CD. It's an eclectic cross-section of people, he said, including students of all ages, families with young kids and old Carrboro hippies.

Williams and Andrews said the event offers so much because it receives so much as well. The festival receives a lot of local support. Andrews said they have a lot of help from volunteers, plus a volunteer committee, as well as help from the Recreation and Parks Department, and the police.

"It's really nice to have that kind of support," Andrews said. "The whole town really chips in, and it wouldn't happen without their contributions."
